The two ponds at St. Casimir Catholic Cemetery are not within the formal burial grounds, but are off in a wild, open grassland to the west. American kestrels fly across this open plain, and kingfishers use the pond.

Portions of the open space are used for storing landscape waste or for other operations, but most of it is unused. The field around the ponds consists of European grasses and teasel. The shorelines of the ponds are not mowed, and have grown up in willows, grasses, and sedges. Families come to the ponds to fish.

Enter the cemetery off 111th Street, between Pulaski and Western Avenues. Follow the road off to the right, taking it almost to the farthest point south, before it loops around back to the east. Take the dirt road off to the right (high clearance vehicle recommended), or walk from this point. Ponds are on the left.
